Summary Face to Face with Aging is Ryan's contribution to a growing academic field that is using positive aging concepts, thinking, and research to bring about changes in the way older adults feel about themselves and their world. Ryan discusses the history and development of positive aging, what conditions make it possible, and how it can be implemented on an individual level. She discusses the theory behind its application, and talks about the difference between positive aging and the more traditional approach of aging as a path to deterioration and suffering. The book ends with a description of the course which Ryan and her co-workers conducted in the Boston area in 1995 called "Relationships and Aging: An Exploration of Problems and Possibilities." More particularly, the present disclosure relates to systems and methods that are utilized to deter short circuit and thermal runaway. Rechargeable batteries or cells are used in a wide variety of electronic applications, such as cellular phones, laptop computers, and power tools. Typically, such batteries or cells contain a number of individual battery cells electrically connected together. These batteries or cells are typically built in an arrangement where one or more positive electrodes, negative electrodes, and corresponding electrolytes are each housed within one of the cells. Cells generally operate by reversibly transferring ions between electrodes to create an electrical current flow. Over time, the batteries or cells may develop defects, as is well known by those of skill in the art. To reduce waste and/or improve safety and/or service life, battery manufacturers may employ a “charge 3da54e8ca3
